This matter is before the court on the United States of America’s (“the Government”) Motion to Exclude Discussion of Possible Penalties Testifying Co-Defendants Face [Dkt. No. 192] upon their conviction. For the reasons discussed below, the court grants the Government’s motion.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

Co-Defendants Raul Minaya-Mena (“Minaya-Mena”) and Sequndino Cabrera-Ramirez (“Cabrera-Ramirez”) were jointly indicted by a Federal Grand Jury, which returned a Superseding Indictment on July 10, 2012.

These Co-Defendants were indicted on one count of conspiracy to possess with the intent to distribute in excess of 100 or more marijuana plants in violation of 21 U.S.C §§ 841(a)(1), (b)(1)(B), (b)(1)(D) and 21 U.S.C. § 846 and one count of possession with intent to distribute 100 or more marijuana plants and aiding and abetting each other in the commission of that offense in violation of 21 U.S.C §§ 841(a)(1) and (b)(1)(B). The Government contends that if convicted of Count 1, the most serious offense, each Defendant is subject to a penalty of a minimum sentence of five years (5) and a maximum sentence of forty (40) years imprisonment. See 21 U.S.C § 841(a)(1), (b)(1)(B).

The Government intends to call as witnesses cooperating defendants who have pleaded guilty to drug conspiracy offenses. The Government seeks to exclude references to the sentences potentially facing cooperating witnesses because such information would allow a jury to infer the potential sentences of Minaya-Mena and Cabrera-Ramirez which could cause a sympathetic jury to hesitate to find these Co-Defendants guilty if they viewed those potential sentences as extreme.

DISCUSSION

The Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution provides that a person accused in a criminal prosecution is guaranteed the right to confront witnesses against him. U.S. Const. amend. XI. However, the United States Supreme Court has recognized that “trial judges retain wide latitude insofar as the Confrontation Clause is concerned to impose reasonable limits on such cross-examination based on concerns about, among other things, harassment, prejudice, confusion of the issues, the witness' safety, or interrogation that is repetitive or only marginally relevant.” Delaware v. Van Arsdall, 475 U.S. 673, 679 (1986). The United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit has recognized one such reasonable limit to cross-examination in United States v. Cropp, 127 F.3d 354, 358 (4th Cir. 1997), in which the court found that a trial court did not abuse its discretion in preventing defense counsel from questioning the defendant's co-conspirators in a drug distribution scheme about the specific penalties they hoped or expected to receive in exchange for cooperating with the Government. Instead, the court allowed defense counsel to inquire as to whether the co-conspirators signed plea agreements, whether they anticipated a “severe penalty” prior to cooperation, and whether they expected to receive a lesser sentence for cooperating. Id. On appeal, the Fourth Circuit affirmed the district court's decision to limit references to the specific sentences witnesses believed or hoped they would receive in exchange for their cooperation. Id. The court agreed with "the district court's concern that the jury might 'nullify' its verdict if it knew the extreme penalties faced by the appellants." Id. The court reasoned that "whatever slight additional margin of probative information gained by quantitative questions" about the length of potential sentences hoped for had to be weighed against "certain prejudice that would result from a sympathetic jury when it learns that its verdict of guilty will result in sentences of ten and twenty years in prison." Id. at 359.

The Fourth Circuit has consistently found, in accordance with Cropp, that a court does not abuse its discretion in limiting cross-examination of witnesses about the perceived or actual sentences they would have faced had they not cooperated. See United States v. Johnson, 363 F. App'x 247, 249 (4th Cir. 2010) (per curiam) (unpublished) (district court permissibly restricted questioning of cooperating witness as to the actual sentence an additional gun charge would have carried); United States v. Shelton, 200 F. App'x 219, 220-21 (4th Cir. 2006) (per curiam) (unpublished) ("Restricting counsel from delving into the particular details of the potential sentences each witness could have, but did not necessarily face" was an appropriate use of the court's discretion.); United States v. Givens, 200 F. App'x 213 (4th Cir. 2006) (per curiam) (unpublished) (finding no abuse of discretion in limiting cross-examination of two witnesses about the length of the sentences they received); cf. United States v. Brown, 201 F.3d 437 (4th Cir. 1999) (per curiam) (unpublished) (finding harmless any error the district court may have committed when it prevented defense counsel from asking the government's witnesses how they thought their plea agreements would impact the mandatory sentences they faced).

The Government contends that the relevant facts in this case are similar to the facts in Cropp since the cooperating defendants who will testify against Minaya-Mena and Cabrera-Ramirez face similar penalties. As a result, the Government argues that this court should similarly exclude questions about the specific sentences of cooperating witnesses to avoid the potential for prejudice that would result from the jury inferring the potential sentences faced by Minaya-Mena and Cabrera-Ramirez.

Cropp addresses the issue of whether preventing a defendant's inquiry into a cooperating witness's actual sentence also prevents the defendant from exploring that witness's potential bias. The Cropp court cited with approval United States v. Luciano-Mosquera, 63 F.3d 1142, 1153 (1st Cir. 1995), in which the First Circuit Court of Appeals found the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it limited defense counsel's inquiry into the actual sentence faced by a co-conspirator convicted on the same firearms charge as the defendant. The court found the inquiry was "an impermissible attempt to inform the jury about the defendant's possible punishment." Id. The court further found that defense counsel had sufficient opportunity to expose the witness's potential bias without disclosing the actual number of years he would have faced on the firearms charge, which the court believed would have certainly prejudiced the defendant. Id. The Cropp court "embrace[d] this reasoning," noting that the appellants could not demonstrate why "questions about exact sentences feared and sentences hoped for were necessary when the jury was already well aware that the witnesses were cooperators facing severe penalties if they did not provide the government with incriminating information." Cropp, 127 F.3d at 359 (emphasis in original).

In this case, there is a danger that testimony from cooperating witnesses about the specific sentence they face could provide the jury enough information to infer the potential sentences of Minaya-Mena and Cabrera-Ramirez. Additionally, the court finds that defense counsel has numerous avenues available to probe the cooperating witnesses' potential motivations, biases, and interests without revealing their specific sentences or sentencing ranges.

CONCLUSION

Having considered the memorandum filed by the Government and the record currently before the court, for the reasons stated above, the court GRANTS the Government's Motion to Exclude Discussion of Possible Penalties Testifying Co-Defendants Face [Dkt. No. 192]. References to specific sentences or specific sentencing ranges potentially faced by the Co-Defendants herein or the Government's cooperating witnesses will be excluded.

IT IS SO ORDERED.
